Not illustrated. 1892 Excerpt: .conjoined to metritis, or of itself give rise to symptoms simulating metritis. It is the same with inflammation of the rectum, with tenesmus, and even a glairy secretion (anal leucorrhoea) that is sometimes noticed at the same time as an acute metritis, upon which it is dependent. It is then necessary not to miss the original cause through paying too much attention to the result. In one case I have seen sphincter algia, not accompanied by fissure of the anus, which yielded to the treatment of cervical metritis. More exceptionally, disease of the rectum inversely induces symptoms of pseudo-metritis, but it may be seen. I published a case of rectal polypus which gave rise to symptoms that were for a long time attributed to metritis, and the patient had undergone very energetic treatment for the suspected disease, without finding the least benefit. Rectal examination disclosed to me the cause of the evil, and removal of the polypus completely cured the patient. A fact that had contributed to the error was that the patient wrongly attributed to metrorrhagia a discharge of blood that really came from the rectum. Troubles in general health, or reflex symptoms, are often so marked that they disguise the local lesion, and cause it to be misconstrued. A woman may complain of a persistent cough, of shortness of breath, or of progressive wasting, and scarcely mention her leucorrhoea and abdominal pain. One is almost tempted to suspect pulmonary phthisis at the outset, until auscultation...
